

The working-man lived in poverty and want, and saw that others were better off than he.

It was not clear to his mind why he, who did more for society than the rich idler, should be the one to suffer under these conditions.

Want conquered his inherited respect for the sacredness of property and he stole.