

The rich man lived without poverty and want, but saw that others were better off than he.

It was not clear to his mind why he, who did more for society than any other, should be the one to suffer under these conditions.

Want conquered his inherited respect for the sacredness of property and he stole.